Although maps such as these raised the question whether partisan gerrymandering was also a violation of an individual's voting rights, the Supreme Court in 1983 appeared to make it even more difficult to challenge a redistricting map on grounds other than population deviation. In a 5–4 decision, the Court ruled in Karcher v. Daggett that states must adhere as closely as possible to the one-person, one-vote standard and bear the burden of proving that deviations from precise population equality were made in pursuit of a legitimate goal. The decision overturned New Jersey's congressional map because the variation between the most populated and the least populated districts was 0.69 percent.

Brennan, who wrote the Court's opinion in Baker and Kirkpatrick, also wrote the opinion in Karcher, contending that population differences between districts "could have been avoided or significantly reduced with a good-faith effort to achieve population equality." "Adopting any standard other than population equality, using the best census data available, would subtly erode the Constitution's ideal of equal representation," Brennan wrote. "In this case, appellants argue that a maximum deviation of approximately 0.7 percent should be considered de minimis. If we accept that argument, how are we to regard deviations of 0.8 percent, 0.95 percent, 1.0 percent or 1.1 percent?... To accept the legitimacy of unjustified, though small population deviations in this case would mean to reject the basic premise of Kirkpatrick and Wesberry."

Brennan said that "any number of consistently applied legislative policies might justify" some population variation. These included "making districts compact, respecting municipal boundaries, preserving the cores of prior districts, and avoiding contests between incumbent Representatives." However, he cautioned, the state must show "with some specificity that a particular objective required the specific deviations in its plan, rather than simply relying on general assertions."

In his dissent Justice White criticized the majority for its "unreasonable insistence on an unattainable perfection in the equalizing of congressional districts." He warned that the decision would invite "further litigation of virtually every congressional redistricting plan in the nation."

Partisan Gerrymandering

In Karcher the Court did not address the underlying political issue in the New Jersey case, which was that its map had been drawn to serve Democratic interests. As a partisan gerrymander, the map had few peers, boasting some of the most oddly shaped districts in the country. One constituency, known as the "fishhook" by its detractors, twisted through central New Jersey's industrial landscape, picking up Democratic voters along the way. Another stretched from the suburbs of New York to the fringes of Trenton.

NOTES: This table lists the forty-three states that have lost or gained seats in the House of Representatives in one or more of the past five census reapportionments. Seven of the fifty states have kept the same number of seats from 1960 through 2000. Three states—Delaware, Vermont, and Wyoming—have kept the minimum required one seat; three states—Idaho, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island—have kept two seats; and South Carolina has kept six seats.

In separate dissents Justices Lewis F. Powell Jr. and John Paul Stevens broadly hinted that they were willing to hear constitutional challenges to instances of partisan gerrymandering. “A legislator cannot represent his constituents properly—nor can voters from a fragmented district exercise the ballot intelligently—when a voting district is nothing more than an artificial unit divorced from, and indeed often in conflict with, the various communities established in the State,” wrote Powell.

The Court’s opportunity to address that issue came in Davis v. Bandemer. On June 30, 1986, the Court ruled that political gerrymanders are subject to constitutional review by federal courts, even if the disputed districts meet the one-person, one-vote test. The case arose from a challenge by Indiana Democrats who argued that the Republican-drawn map so heavily favored the Republican Party that Democrats were denied appropriate representation. But the Court rejected the Democrats’ challenge to the alleged gerrymander, saying that one election was insufficient to prove unconstitutional discrimination. Left unclear were what standards the Court would use to find a partisan gerrymander legally unacceptable.

National Republicans expressed delight with the Bandemer decision. The GOP had long held that Democratic control over most state legislatures had allowed them to draw congressional and legislative districts to their partisan advantage. In particular, Republicans expressed confidence that the Bandemer decision laid the groundwork for overturning California’s congressional district map, created by Democratic Rep. Phillip Burton in the early 1980s.

Widely recognized as a classic example of a partisan gerrymander, the map featured a number of oddly shaped districts, drawn neither compactly nor with respect to community boundaries, but all with nearly equal populations. As one commentator described it, “Burton carefully stretched districts from one Democratic enclave to another—sometimes joining them with nothing but a bridge, a stretch of harbor, or a spit of land ... avoiding Republicans block for block and household for household.” Before the 1982 elections, Democrats held twenty-two congressional districts; Republicans, twenty-one. With the Burton map in place for the 1982 elections, Democrats held twenty-eight seats; Republicans, only seventeen.

Republican representative Robert E. Badham filed a lawsuit against the Burton plan in federal district court in 1983. In the wake of the Bandemer decision, that court held a hearing on Badham v. Eu but dismissed the Republican complaint by a 2–1 vote. The court in essence ruled that a party seeking to overturn a gerrymandered map must show a general pattern of exclusion from the political process, which the California Republican Party, in control of the governorship, a Senate seat, and 40 percent of the House seats, could not do. The Republicans appealed to the Supreme Court, but the Court refused to become involved, voting 6–3 in 1989 to reaffirm the lower court’s decision without comment.

But with the law largely settled on population and racial issues in redistricting, partisan gerrymandering appeared by 2005 to be gaining traction. The Bandemer decision, with its exceptionally difficult standard to prove a partisan drawing of lines, still was the controlling law and remained so when the Court in 2004, in Vieth v. Jubelirer, rejected a claim under it to districts in Pennsylvania that Democrats said were constitutionally invalid. In that case the swing vote on the Court came from Anthony M. Kennedy, who agreed that the Pennsylvania Democrats had not shown enough evidence to meet the framework for partisan gerrymandering set out in Bandemer. But Kennedy also said that because no adequate standard to measure partisan gerrymandering had yet emerged did not mean that it would never evolve in the future.<sup>14</sup> (See “Pennsylvania,” p. 963.)

Two instances of partisan gerrymandering were prominent after the 2000 census. In Colorado, Republicans sought to tweak district lines to enhance the reelection chances of an incumbent who barely won in 2002. On December 1, 2003, the state supreme court, however, ruled a second redistricting in the decade was impermissible under the state’s constitution. The U.S. Supreme Court in 2004 declined to review the decision.

In Texas, however, Republicans orchestrated a major redrawing of some district lines with the goal of defeating as many as seven incumbents who had won in 2002 under a court-ordered redistricting plan. After their second remap of the decade was passed, six of the seven lost in the new districts in 2004. Democrats charged the action was unconstitutional, but courts did not accept their contention. Initially, the Supreme Court in 2004 sent the case back to a Texas court with the instructions to reconsider the issue in light of its decision in Vieth v. Jubelirer. When the case returned to the Court in 2006, the justices upheld the mid-decade partisan gerrymander because the Texas Democrats failed to offer a workable standard for constitutional review. At the same time they struck down a small part of the remap on grounds that it violated the Voting Rights Act’s provisions protecting against the dilution of minority voting strength. (See “Texas,” p. 963.)

Minority Representation

One form of gerrymandering is expressly forbidden by law: redistricting for the purpose of racial discrimination. The Voting Rights Act of 1965, extended in 1970, 1975, and 1982, banned redistricting that diluted the voting strength of black communities. Other minorities, including Hispanics, Asian Americans, American Indians, and native Alaskans, subsequently were brought under the protection of the law.

In 1980 the Supreme Court for the first time narrowed the reach of the Voting Rights Act in the case of Mobile v. Bolden, a challenge to the at-large system of electing city commissioners used in Mobile, Alabama. By a vote of 6–3, the Court ruled that proof of discriminatory intent by the commissioners was necessary before a violation could be found. The fact that no African American had ever been elected under the challenged system was not proof enough.

The Mobile decision set off an immediate reaction on Capitol Hill. In extending the Voting Rights Act in 1982, Congress amended it to outlaw any practice that has the effect of discriminating against blacks or other minorities—regardless of the lawmakers’ intent.

The Justice Department later adopted a similar “results test” for another part of the act (section 5), which requires certain states and localities with a history of discrimination to have their electoral plans “precleared” by the department. In 1986 the Supreme Court applied this test in Thornburg v. Gingles, ruling that six of North Carolina’s multimember legislative districts impermissibly diluted black voting strength. Sharply departing from Mobile, the Court held that because few blacks had been elected from these districts, the system must be in violation of the law.

The Court also used the Thornburg decision to develop three criteria that, if met, would lead to the creation of a minority legislative district: the minority group must be large and geographically compact enough to constitute a majority in a single-member electoral district; the group must be politically cohesive; and the white majority must vote as a bloc to the degree that it usually can defeat candidates preferred by the minority.

Thus, within a period of ten years the burden of proof was shifted from minorities, who had been required to show that lines were being drawn to dilute their voting strength, to lawmakers, who had to show that they had done all they could to maximize minority voting strength.

Earlier, however, the maps drawn for the 1990s that went to extraordinary lengths to elect minorities came quickly under scrutiny by the Supreme Court. The most celebrated ruling came in a 1993 case involving congressional districts in North Carolina, Shaw v. Reno. In that case Justice Sandra Day O’Connor wrote for the Court majority that any map that groups people “who may have little in common with one another but the color of their skin bears an uncomfortable resemblance to political apartheid.” The ruling reinstated a suit by five white North Carolinians who contended that the state’s congressional district map, which created two oddly shaped majority-minority districts, violated their right to equal protection under law by diluting their votes.

In 1995 the Court ruled in Miller v. Johnson, a case involving districts in Georgia, that using race as “the predominant factor” in drawing districts is presumed to be unconstitutional, unless it serves a compelling government interest. The decision struck down a redistricting plan that created three black-majority districts.

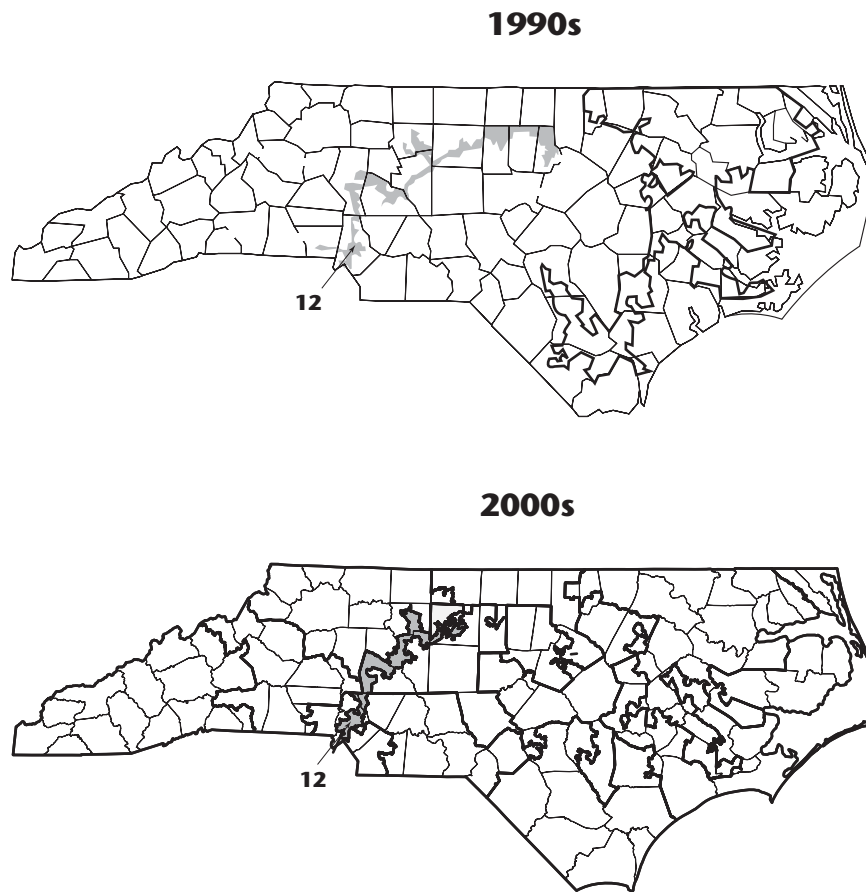

Those two rulings represented a speedy swing of the judicial pendulum away from the 1986 Gingles doctrine of maximizing minority voting strength in redistricting. As the 1990s unfolded, the constitutionality of majority-minority districts was widely challenged, and eventually, federal courts ordered a number of states—including Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, New York, North Carolina, Texas, and Virginia—to redraw districts that were adjudged to be unconstitutional racial gerrymanders.

But the Supreme Court did not make sweeping determinations affecting all majority-minority districts. In Illinois, a majority-minority district was allowed to stand after the state argued successfully that it had a “compelling state interest” in giving Chicago’s large Hispanic population the opportunity to elect one representative of its own. In a 1999 North Carolina case, Hunt v. Cromartie, the Court unanimously ruled that mapmakers could create a district with a “supermajority” of black Democrats as long as the primary reason for doing so was political, not racial.

Even though numerous majority-minority districts were redrawn in the 1990s to reduce minority populations, nearly all those districts retained members of minority groups as their representatives by the end of the twentieth century. Nevertheless, the mapmakers following the 2000 census devised many bizarrely shaped districts, some for racial reasons but many for incumbent-protection purposes. The North Carolina Twelfth District, a serpentine majority-minority creation in the 1990s that was the focus of the Supreme Court’s actions, survived in a roughly similar configuration in 2001. But in Illinois mapmakers outdid even North Carolina in creating the Seventeenth District, one of the strangest in the nation, taking in nine full counties and parts of fourteen others for the purpose of protecting a Democratic incumbent.

In 2009 the Court again addressed the Voting Rights Act when it narrowed application of language from the act’s 1982 extension. In Bartlett v. Strickland, two North Carolina counties challenged a new legislative district created out of parts of both counties. The state’s purpose in the remap was to create a “cross-over” district, which is one that has a substantial minority population, but less than a majority. In this district only 39 percent of the population was African American, less than the 50 percent standard required under the Voting Rights Act. North Carolina argued that the act allowed creating such districts in which minority voters, in combination with white supporters, had a reasonable change of electing a minority member. The Court disagreed, saying the act did not require states to create such cross-over districts. The majority ruled that the act’s provisions applied “only when a geographically compact group of minority voters could form a majority in a single-member district.”

House redistricting in some states after the 1990 census sought to create so-called majority-minority districts that were likely to elect a person from a minority group, usually an African American. The effort resulted in unusually shaped districts such as North Carolina's 12th. The Supreme Court in a series of rulings cast doubt on these configurations, and mapmakers after the 2000 census focused on other concerns, particularly protection of incumbents. Nevertheless, North Carolina's 12th District in 2002 (above, bottom) looked similar to the 1990s version (above, top). States with large minority populations continued efforts after the 2000 count to make sure district configurations provided representation in the House for minority groups.

MID-DECADE REDISTRICTING AND PARTISAN GERRYMANDERING

The always contentious act of drawing boundaries for House districts in Congress took on a new flavor—and controversy—in the years following the 2000 census. For the first time in more than a century, politicians in a few states sought to enhance their party's power by redrawing district lines outside the long-accepted window of about two years following a decennial census. Although only a few states had moved in that direction, the prospect of widespread mid-decade redistricting threatened even more intense partisan conflict in the period before the 2010 census and raised questions about the value of settled political divisions within a once widely accepted time period.

The redistricting efforts that followed the original post-2000 census redistricting were driven to boost the fortunes of major parties and to redress the division of House seats that their advocates argued did not reflect twenty-first century political alignments in each state. These efforts—in Colorado, Georgia, and Texas—had their roots in each state's recent shifting patterns of partisan competition, but taken together they appeared also to have a collateral effect on a growing national movement to alter the manner in which House district lines were drawn. The advocates of change were arguing for removing the redistricting power from state legislators and governors and investing it in independent commissions, as was already done in a small number of states. This movement, which was at most embryonic as states were redrawing lines after 2000, had other causes, most particularly a growing national belief that districting as normally practiced contributed to largely noncompetitive races in which most House incumbents were returned to Washington with little difficulty. A number of self-styled good government groups, Common Cause in particular, seized on the redistricting issue as—in their view—a major impediment to representative, competitive Houses elections. However, many noncompetitive elections were often seen as highly representative of the voter preferences in a geographic region. (See “Competitiveness and Incumbency,” p. 949.)

A census bureau worker verifies an address in the spring of 2009 to ensure that every household will receive a census questionnaire in 2010. Congressional districts may be redrawn following the 2010 census.

Also complicating the redistricting controversy was an effort by some aggrieved voters to challenge district boundaries on judicial grounds of partisan gerrymandering. This legal attack had not won favor in the courts and was, under existing legal theories, exceedingly difficult to prove. The Supreme Court in 2004 rejected such a claim in a case that came from Pennsylvania but left standing an earlier decision that said such claims might in time be proven, thereby leaving open the opportunity to litigate on partisan gerrymandering.

Two of the mid-decade redistricting efforts, Colorado and Texas, arose originally from the special circumstances of court-ordered plans following the 2000 census. But both also were overlaid with partisan efforts, Republican in both cases, to enlarge the GOP’s majority in Congress. In Georgia the original House district lines were drawn after 2000 by a Democratic majority in the state. But by 2005 Republicans were in control and saw an opportunity to redraw the lines to their party’s advantage. For both Georgia and Texas, Republicans argued that the redistricting they wanted to put in place was no more than a natural reflection of the emerging political orientation of each state away from Democratic and toward Republican majorities. In Colorado, the motives were seen mainly as a Republican effort to simply improve reelection chances of one of its GOP members. Still, regardless of the background to these actions, all raised the possibility that other states where legislative control had changed hands between the parties would undertake similar bare-knuckles redrawing of lines for partisan gains.

Redrawing of district lines beyond the normal window following a census was not unprecedented in U.S. history. Instances occurred in the late nineteenth century. But the mid-decade redistricting efforts after 2000 were the first in modern times outside of legal decisions that required new lines. The most important came in 1964 when the U.S. Supreme Court first applied a one-person, one-vote standard to the drawing of congressional maps. In the following decades some states, mostly in the South, had to redistrict—some more than once—under court orders that grew from efforts to draw lines enhancing opportunities for minorities to win election, creating the majority-minority districts.

Whether unprecedented or not, mid-decade redistricting introduces a potential flaw in the logic underpinning redrawing of the legislative district boundaries, which are supposed to be based on the decennial census. The census is an actual enumeration of the population, and yet the U.S. population is not static. In fact, the census counts are out of date as soon as they are compiled and published because of the constant migration of people from one place to another. So even with the availability of periodic Census Bureau population reestimates following the decennial enumeration, a redrawing of boundaries using these estimated results would not be based on an actual count at that time. Moreover, the accuracy of that actual count, if used as the basis for drawing maps three, five, or even seven years out from the enumeration, is open to challenge.<sup>15</sup>

Colorado

The Republican-controlled Colorado General Assembly on May 7, 2003, cleared legislation redrawing the state’s seven House districts. Republican Gov. Bill Owens signed the law two days later. The new map was designed to enhance the GOP leanings of two potentially competitive districts held by Republicans in the 108th Congress: the Third District, which covered the western half of the state, and the Seventh District, in suburban Denver. In the latter, a Republican won in 2002 by the closest margin of any House race—121 votes out of 172,879 cast. The legal premise for the legislature acting was similar to the situation in Texas. Colorado gained one seat in reapportionment after the 2000 census, but the state house and senate, then held by the Republicans and Democrats, respectively, in 2001, failed to agree on a map. Instead, the map used in the 2002 election had been adopted by a state district court judge.

On December 1, 2003, however, the Colorado Supreme Court struck down the new map created by the state legislature, ruling that it violated the state constitution. That document “limits redistricting to once per census, and nothing in state or federal law negates this limitation,” Chief Justice Mary Mullarkey wrote for a 5–2 majority. “Having failed to redistrict when it should have, the General Assembly has lost its chance to redistrict until after the 2010 federal census.” In dissent, Justice Rebecca Love Kourlis wrote that “courts cannot be lawmakers under Article V” of the state constitution, which said that after each census the legislature “shall divide the state into congressional districts accordingly.” In 2004 the U.S. Supreme Court rejected a request from Colorado Republicans to review the Colorado Supreme Court ruling.

Following the 2000 census, Democrats and Republicans were particularly interested in drawing new House districts that protected incumbents and were less concerned about creating new districts that benefited their party—although a good deal of that went on also. One of the most striking examples of a bizarrely shaped district that was drawn to ensure the reelection of an incumbent was the 17th District in Illinois. The 17th covered nine full counties and parts of fourteen others.

The case came back to the U.S. Supreme Court after four Colorado voters brought suit seeking to overturn the court-ordered redistricting plan on grounds that it violated the Elections Clause of the U.S. Constitution because the judiciary and not the legislature had fashioned the redistricting plan. On May 5, 2007, the Court, in Lance v. Coffman, issued a unanimous per curiam decision that held that the voters had no standing to bring the lawsuit. The Court ruled that the voters had “no particularized stake” because their grievance was an “undifferentiated, generalized” one, different in character from injuries alleged in voting rights cases. (See Article I, section 4, in box, Constitutional Provisions, p. 935.)

Pennsylvania

The Pennsylvania case, Vieth v. Jubelirer, grew from allegations by state Democrats who argued that the congressional map used in the 2002 elections unconstitutionally benefited the GOP. Legislation setting those boundaries was written by a Republican-majority Pennsylvania General Assembly and signed in early 2002 by Republican Gov. Mark Schweiker. The aim was to guarantee that the party would gain House seats even after Pennsylvania lost two seats in the reapportionment following the 2000 census. Republicans had won eleven of the state’s twenty-one seats in 2000. After redistricting, which paired six Democratic incumbents in three districts, the party won twelve of the remaining nineteen seats in 2002 in a state that Democratic presidential candidate Al Gore carried in 2000 and Democrat Edward G. Rendell won in the 2002 gubernatorial race.

Democrats maintained that several of the meandering districts in the new map failed to adequately reflect communities of interest by, for example, hewing to county boundaries. Republicans maintained that the map complied with legal requirements.

The U.S. Supreme Court in 2004 ruled against the Democrats in a 5–4 decision but did not—as several justices wanted—overrule a 1986 decision, on which the Pennsylvania case was based, that said political gerrymandering could be a subject of legal action.

The case marked the Court’s first review of a partisan gerrymandering case. The 1986 ruling Davis v. Bandemer said that successful challengers to a map on partisan grounds had to “prove both intentional discrimination against an identifiable political group and an actual discriminatory effect on that group.” It also held that political gerrymandering suits could be brought under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. No state or congressional redistricting plan had been invalidated under the Bandemer standard.

Because no standard to judge political gerrymandering had been formed, the most conservative justices, led by Antonin Scalia, wanted to overturn Bandemer. But five other justices were loath to dismiss the possibility of valid future claims to unconstitutional political gerrymandering. Writing for the majority, Justice Anthony Kennedy said: “That a workable standard for measuring a gerrymander’s burden on representational rights has not yet emerged does not mean that none will emerge in the future.”

Texas

Texas presented a situation similar to Colorado in some respects, but the outcome was different. The original map for Texas congressional districts during the 2000s was drawn in 2001 by a three-judge federal panel after the Democratic state house and Republican state senate could not agree on new lines. The map was designed principally to protect incumbents, as was the case in many other states. In 2002 the state elected fifteen Republicans and seventeen Democrats to the House for the 108th Congress.

Texas Republicans, led by House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, the most influential Texan in the state's congressional delegation, contended that the court redistricting did not reflect the new political realities in the state: the GOP was the dominant party in Texas, which, as with most of the southern states, was becoming increasingly Republican. In 2003, for example, all twenty-nine of the statewide elected officeholders were Republicans, and Republicans by 2003 were in control of both houses in the state legislature for the first time since Reconstruction.

DeLay became the driving force that eventually led to redrawing of the lines but only after a bizarre series of events that drew national attention—and considerable ridicule—to the state. Getting a plan approved required three special sessions of the legislature, made all the more colorful by Democratic lawmakers fleeing the state—in what late-night comedians compared with episodes out of the Old West—to deny Republicans enough members present to conduct business. They first decamped to Oklahoma and later to New Mexico before deciding the effort was futile and returned to their jobs as legislators.

As a result, on October 12, 2003, the Republican-majority legislature cleared a bill drawing a new congressional district map and Republican governor Rick Perry signed it into law the next day. The comprehensive redrawing of the lines was designed to produce as many as seven additional GOP House members after the 2004 elections. The state, which had gained two more seats following the 2000 census, had the second-largest congressional delegation, after California.

As everyone expected, litigation followed. On December 19, 2003, the Justice Department endorsed, or precleared, the new map. Texas was one of sixteen mostly southern states required under the Voting Rights Act to obtain a determination from the Justice Department or the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia that any proposed voting change “does not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote” of protected minority groups. A congressional map in those states could be legally enforced only after it had been precleared.

Texas Democrats and African American and Hispanic advocacy groups nonetheless filed suit in federal court, alleging that the map would unconstitutionally dilute the political strength of blacks and Hispanics by spreading their numbers among GOP districts. The Democrats also maintained that the map disenfranchised ethnic minorities in Texas by threatening the reelection of white Democratic incumbents who were overwhelmingly their candidates of choice. Republicans responded candidly that their motivations were entirely political, not racial. Their main aim was to undercut the prospects of Democrats and to bolster the prospects of Republicans, in concert with the changed partisan political landscape of the state.

On January 6, 2004, a three-judge federal panel upheld the map. “The allegation that the minority voting strength in these districts has been diluted is in truth no more than a claim that these districts have been drawn to add Republican voting strength to overcome the election advantage that the current Democrat incumbents hold,” wrote Judge Patrick E. Higginbotham of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals and District Court Judge Lee H. Rosenthal. All three judges ruled against Democratic arguments that the new map was an unconstitutional political gerrymander and that the legislature was not permitted to substitute a new map for the court-drawn plan. Neither the Texas constitution nor the U.S. Constitution explicitly bars redrawing lines more than once per decade, they said.

Ten days later, the U.S. Supreme Court denied the Democrats' request to stay the ruling in the case, Jackson v. Perry. That seemed to end the matter, but in 2004 the Court sent the case back to the lower court, suggesting the judges should consider the matter again in light of the justices' decision on the Pennsylvania case that involved political gerrymandering.

On election day 2004 the redistricting was a smashing success for the Republicans. The GOP picked up six of the seven seats they targeted. One of the targeted Democrats retired and a second switched to the Republican Party. In the other four districts, Republicans defeated Democratic incumbents. Only one Democrat, one of the most conservative members of his party in the House, survived.

In March 2006 the refashioned lawsuit, League of United Latin American Citizens et al. v. Perry, was back before the Court for a full hearing on whether the Democrats' challenge to the Texas mid-decade redistricting plan presented, in Justice Anthony Kennedy's words, any "manageable, reliable measure of fairness for determining whether a partisan gerrymander" is unconstitutional. The case also raised questions about whether several of the new districts violated a provision of the Voting Rights Act by diluting minority voting strength. The first issue touched on the precedents in Bandemer and Vieth v. Jubelirer—whether partisan gerrymanders presented justiciable issues with workable constitutional standards that would keep courts out of the thorniest parts of the political thicket. The second issue raised a claim along the line of cases dealing with racial gerrymandering in which the Court had demonstrated less deference to mapmaking by state legislatures.

The Supreme Court issued its ruling on June 28, 2006. With two new justices—Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Associate Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.—the Court had the opportunity to reverse Bandemer and Vieth or fashion a new standard for striking down unfair partisan gerrymanders, thus bringing some clarity to the ambiguities of the two precedents. The 2006 decision proved disappointing to advocates of either position. In a fractured ruling in which justices both joined and dissented in so many parts of one another's opinions that observers were left scratching their heads, Justice Kennedy wrote the opinion of the Court upholding the mid-decade redistricting in general but striking down the district map in the Twenty-third District as a violation of the Voting Rights Act. The Court passed on the opportunity to ban mid-decade redistricting as an unfair political gerrymander by a vote of 7–2 and in so doing opened the door to rolling redistricting as a partisan strategy whenever state legislatures change political hands. While not condoning this practice, a majority of the justices could find no clear statutory or constitutional prohibition of it and no "manageable, reliable measure of fairness" to embolden courts to enter the political thicket and strike it down.

The decision, however, required a new map to rectify the Voting Rights Act violation in Texas's Twenty-third District, which a lower federal court refashioned by August. The March 7, 2006, Texas primary results for the affected districts were voided by this action, and the November 7, 2006, general election ballots in these districts listed all candidates, regardless of party, on a single ballot, with runoff elections to be held if no candidate received a majority vote. Henry Bonilla, the Republican incumbent from the Twenty-third District, ultimately lost the seat to Democrat Ciro Rodriguez when the final results were tallied. Rodriguez retained the seat in the 2008 elections.

Georgia

The situation in Georgia was strictly partisan. District lines following the 2000 census were drawn by the legislature under Democratic control. The effort produced some of the oddest shaped districts of any in the United States. In 2005 when Republicans gained control of the state legislature they created a new plan aimed at getting the GOP nine of the state's thirteen House seats. Under the Democratic plan Republicans held seven of the seats to six for the Democrats. As with Texas, Republicans argued that the previous district configuration did not reflect the political realities in Georgia that by mid-decade were increasingly Republican. Legal challenges to the plan were unsuccessful, and the 2006 congressional elections were contested under the redrawn maps. The election results, however, frustrated the partisan ambitions behind the mid-decade redistricting as Democrats retained all six House seats, all of which they held again in the 2008 elections. While the margin of victory for two of the Democratic incumbents was razor-thin in 2006, the two Democrats in 2008 increased their victory margins substantially with one winning 66 percent of the vote and the other 57 percent. Even before the election, Georgia governor Sonny Perdue, a Republican, appointed a taskforce to consider ways to remove the map-drawing part of the redistricting process from the legislature and give it to an independent commission before the next decennial census in 2010.

House General Election Returns, 1824–2008

GENERAL ELECTION RETURNS for the House of Representatives are presented in this chapter. The returns for the years 1824–1973 were obtained from the Inter-University Consortium for Political and Social Research (ICPSR) at the University of Michigan. Major sources for returns for the years 1974–2008 were Congressional Quarterly and CQ Press, which obtained them from the state secretaries of state, and the America Votes series, published biennially by CQ Press in Washington, D.C. Richard M. Scammon and Alice V. McGillivray of the Elections Research Center, Washington, D.C., created the series first published in 1956. Since 1996 the series has been compiled by Rhodes Cook.

The symbol # next to returns before 1974 indicates that information was obtained from a source other than the ICPSR. A complete set of other sources used appears on page 1388. A House Candidates Index is located on pages I-1–I-168.

While the complete source annotations for the ICPSR collection are too extensive to publish here, information on the sources for specific election returns can be obtained through the ICPSR. (See box, ICPSR Historical Election Returns File, p. xviii, in Vol. I.)

Presentation of Returns

The House returns are arranged chronologically by year and alphabetically by state for each year. Within each state, single-member districts are listed first in numerical order. At-large seats appear at the end of the single-member districts with “AL” in the district identification column. Multimember districts, in the few instances in which they appear in the nineteenth century, are listed in numerical order under the separate heading “Multimember Districts.”

Special election results appear after all general election returns for each state under a separate “Special Elections” heading. Returns for special off-year elections are listed at the end of the preceding year’s general election returns.

Multimember Districts

During part of the nineteenth century, five New England states—Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Vermont—had state laws requiring that candidates win election to the House by a popular vote majority. The specific procedures varied among the five states. The majority vote requirement was last used in 1892 Rhode Island. (See “Multimember Districts,” p. 926.)

Names and Party Designations

Candidate names appear to the right of the district number, with the candidate receiving the highest number of votes listed first. Other candidates who received at least 5 percent of the total votes cast are listed in descending order. In multimember districts or at-large districts electing more than one representative, candidates who received fewer than 100 votes are not listed.

In some instances, particularly in the nineteenth century, names in the ICPSR file are incomplete. First names were the element most commonly missing in the original sources consulted by the scholars and archivists who gathered the ICPSR returns. In cases where a vote total is known but there is no name at all, or the name obviously could not be identified, the votes are listed as being cast for an “Unidentified Candidate.”

In the ICPSR returns, the distinct—and in many cases, multiple—party designations appearing in the original sources are preserved. In many cases party labels represent combinations of multiparty support received by individual candidates. If, for example, on the ballot and official returns more than one party name was listed next to a candidate’s name, then the party designation appearing in the election returns for that candidate will be a unique abbreviation for that combination of parties. (See “Political Party Abbreviations,” p. 1772, in Reference Materials.)

In the special case of a candidate’s name listed separately on the original ballot under more than one party—where returns were reported separately for each party—the Guide to U.S. Elections sums the votes recorded under the several parties and that figure appears as the candidate’s total vote. Whenever separate party totals have been summed, a comma separates the abbreviations of the parties contributing the largest and second largest share of the total vote.

Most cases of this special situation occurred in New York and Pennsylvania during the twentieth century. For example, in the original ICPSR returns for the House election in New York’s 10th District in 1938, Emanuel Celler received 31,645 votes as the Democratic Party candidate, 12,181 votes as the American Labor Party candidate and 55 votes as the City Fusion Party candidate, for a total of 43,881 votes. The Guide to U.S. Elections sums all votes received by Celler from these three parties (see p. 1210).

The returns for that contest indicate the two parties that contributed the most votes to Celler’s total—separated by a comma. Thus, immediately following his name appear the abbreviations (D, AM LAB), indicating that Celler was a candidate of two or more parties and that he received most votes as a Democrat.

Vote Totals and Percentages

Each candidate’s total vote and percentage of the total vote cast for all candidates appear in columns to the right of the candidate’s name and party designation. Percentages have been calculated to two decimal places and rounded to one place. Due to rounding and the scattered votes of minor candidates, percentages in individual House races may not add up to 100.

Only candidates from single-member districts who received at least 5 percent of the total vote for that election are included. In multimember districts or at-large districts electing more than one representative, candidates who received fewer than 100 votes are not listed.

If no vote total is shown for a candidate but the percentage listed is 100 percent, in most cases the candidate ran unopposed. State election officials either did not put the candidate’s name on the ballot or simply did not make an effort to record the total number of votes. Beginning with the returns for 2000, the editors of Guide to U.S. Elections discontinued use of the 100 percent entry where no votes are reported.

No percentages of total vote have been computed for multimember districts or at-large districts electing more than one representative. Candidates in these types of districts did not run against specific opponents, and in most cases the number of votes cast in any one contest could not be determined.

In some cases, percentages do not appear next to candidates in single-member districts because vote totals for all the candidates who ran in the district were not available even though the names of all candidates may appear. In such cases, the ✓ symbol appears in the vote column of the winning candidate.

EXPLANATION OF SYMBOLS IN HOUSE RETURNS

In the returns for House elections, symbols are used to denote special circumstances. Where no symbol is used, the candidate who received the most votes won the election to the House. The following is a key to the symbols used:

✓ Elected to the House. The symbol is used to identify winning candidates in three types of situation: (1) When candidates ran for two or more at-large seats in states that chose all of their at-large representatives in a single election, or ran in a multimember district; (2) when the vote total and percentage of one or more of the candidate are unavailable; and (3) when a candidate who did not receive the highest vote total was seated by the House. (See “Multimember Districts,” p. 926.)

‡ The symbol is used when an election dispute resulted in the unseating of a representative after he or she was sworn in. (For discussion of specific cases, consult the Biographical Directory of the American Congress, 1774–1996 (Washington, D.C.: CQ Staff Directories, 1997); hereafter referred to as the Biographical Directory.)

* The symbol used for three types of situations: (1) when a representative-elect died or declined a seat before the constitutionally set date for the beginning of his or her term—March 4 until 1935, and January 3 thereafter; (2) when the House refused to seat any candidate claiming election to a seat; and (3) when state law required a candidate to obtain a popular vote majority for election to the House, but the candidate receiving the most votes failed to receive a majority. (For discussion of specific cases, consult the Biographical Directory; See “Majority Elections,” p. 925.)

Information for 1824–1973 was obtained from a source other than the Inter-University Consortium for Political and Social Research (ICPSR) (For a list of the other sources used, see p. 1388.)

Numbered footnotes are used to explain unusual situations, such as a series of elections in the same year in the same House district, anomalies resulting from reapportionment, and special procedures for conducting House elections in certain states. For elections beginning in 1984, footnotes explain the circumstances surrounding special elections. All footnotes are found at the end of all state returns for a particular year, rather than at the bottom of the page on which the footnote first appears.

1. New Hampshire was entitled to six representatives in the House for the 19th Congress (1825–1827). State law required that to be elected, a candidate had to receive a popular vote majority for any particular House seat. With candidates running at large, as they did in the 1824 election, the determination of what constituted a majority was calculated as follows:

First, the total vote was calculated by summing all votes cast for the House, yielding a figure of 72,066. This figure divided by six, the number of House seats to be filled, equals 12,011. In order to win, a candidate thus needed a majority of the 12,011 votes, that is, one half plus one additional vote. Dividing 12,011 by two equals 6,005.5, which was rounded up to whole votes to 6,006—the vote total needed for election.

Five candidates who were running—Bartlett, Whipple, Miller, Eastman and Harvey—received at least 6,006 votes and thus were elected. Miller did not serve in the House; thus an asterisk appears next to his vote total.

Since none of the other candidates qualified for the sixth seat, it remained vacant until a special election was held in 1825 between Webster and Healy, who finished sixth and seventh in 1824. (See 1825 New Hampshire, p. 971.)

2. No information available as to whether the Ohio representatives were elected by district or at large.

1. Brown filled a vacancy left when James Miller was elected in 1824 but did not serve. Healy defeated Webster to fill the state's undecided sixth House seat, which no candidate had won in 1824 due to the majority vote requirement.

2. Rhode Island was entitled to two seats in the 19th Congress (1825–1827), but state law required that a candidate receive a popular vote majority for election. Pearce failed to qualify in the general election but won the subsequent special election shown on this page.

1. Rep. William S. Young died Sept. 20, 1827, and a special election was held to replace him in November of that year. In initial counting of the returns, Thomas Chilton led John Calhoon 2,704 votes to 2,679. But then returns from Hardin County were thrown out, with Chilton losing 1,019 votes and Calhoon losing only 389 votes, making Calhoon the winner. The returns minus Hardin County are listed in the ICPSR data above.

Calhoon then resigned, never having formally claimed the House seat, and both candidates then petitioned the governor to call a new election. A second special election was held Dec. 20–22, and was won by Chilton. No returns are available.

1. Missouri added a second representative after the 1830 census. See Missouri 1832.

2. Joel B. Sutherland was elected from Pennsylvania's 1st district in 1832. He subsequently resigned to become an associate judge of the court of common pleas in Philadelphia, but then ran for and won back his House seat in an 1833 special election.

3. Rhode Island had two House seats for the 23rd Congress (1833–1835). A majority of the vote was required for election. Dutee J. Pearce failed to qualify in the initial election, but was later elected over Dixon in a special election for which no returns are available.

1. Crary was elected to the House from Michigan in 1835 in anticipation that admission to the Union would follow soon thereafter. However, Michigan's admission was delayed until Jan. 26, 1837. Crary took his seat the next day. Thus, the 1835 election entitled him to serve just over one month (Jan. 27, 1837–March 3, 1837) in the 24th Congress (1835–1837).

Special Election

17 Almon H. Read (D)	4,479	60.1
Kingsbury (W)	2,605	34.9
18 Philson (D)	2,711	50.0
James M. Russell (W)	2,634✓	48.6

1. In the 9th district, William S. Hastings, who had been elected in 1840, died June 17, 1842. In the special election to succeed him for the remainder of the 27th Congress (1841–1843), no candidate received the requisite majority. A series of special elections were held, all resulting without choice, so the seat remained vacant for the remainder of the term. No returns are available for these special elections.

1. New Hampshire was entitled to four seats in the 29th Congress (1845–1847), but only elected three representatives. Woodbury did not receive the necessary number of votes to be elected in the 1845 at-large election, and no winner was subsequently chosen in a special election. (See New Hampshire, 1846.) So the fourth seat remained vacant for the entire Congress.

1. In the 4th district, no candidate received the necessary majority. Twelve elections were held to try to fill the seat, but all of them resulted without choice. The seat was vacant for the entire 31st Congress (1849–1851).

2. In the South Carolina 4th district, Sims was elected but died Jan. 16, 1848. McQueen was chosen to succeed him in a special election for which no returns are available.

3. This was the first House election held by Wisconsin after it achieved statehood. Information is unavailable as to whether the elections were at-large or by district.

1. Missouri elected two additional House members to raise its total to the seven seats allotted by the 1850 census. The state was redistricted from five seats to seven, with the new districts labeled "3" and "7." The 3rd congressional district of 1853 is not the same 3rd district that elected a representative in 1852. (See Missouri 1852.)

1. Preston S. Brooks of South Carolina's 4th district, who was serving in the 34th Congress (1855–1857) following his election in 1854, resigned July 14, 1856. He was subsequently reelected to the 34th Congress in a special election which appears on this page. He took his seat Aug. 1, 1856, and was reelected in the general election later in 1856 to the 35th Congress (1857–1859). He died Jan. 27, 1857, and thus did not serve in that Congress.

Laurence M. Keitt of the 3rd district was also serving in the 34th Congress when he resigned July 16, 1856. Subsequently reelected to the 34th Congress in the special election shown on this page to fill the vacancy caused by his resignation, he returned to the House Aug. 6, 1856. Later that year he was reelected to the 35th Congress in the general election.

1. The California Blue Book reports that the California election to the House of Representatives for the 36th Congress was in 1859, not 1858 as reported here by ICPSR. The vote according to the Blue Book was as follows:

AL	John C. Burch (LEC D)	57,665	28.4
	Charles L. Scott (LEC D)	56,998	28.1
	Joseph C. McKibben
	(A-LEC D)	43,474	21.4
	Edward D. Baker (R)	41,438	20.4

This corresponds to the Biographical Directory, which lists Burch and Scott as representing California in the House from 1859–1861.

1859 Elections

1. Rep. Thomas L. Harris died Nov. 24, 1858, following his reelection to the 36th Congress (1859–1861). In a special election in January 1859 to fill the remaining few months of Harris's term in the 35th Congress (1857–1859), the winner was Charles D. Hodges. John A. McClelland was elected in November 1859 to the unexpired term in the 36th Congress.

2. In the 1st district, no candidate received the majority required by state law for election. In a later special election, Christopher Robinson was finally chosen.

1860 Elections

1. South Carolina's six representatives withdrew from the House before the beginning of the 37th Congress (1861–1863), and thus never assumed the seats they were elected to.

(Seceded June 8, 1861)

TEXAS

(Seceded Feb. 1, 1861)

VIRGINIA

(Seceded April 17, 1861)

1. California had two seats in the House during the 36th Congress (1859–1861), but following the reapportionment after the census of 1860 it would have been entitled to three in the 38th Congress (1863–1865). Most states held House elections in even-numbered years, so those which were entitled to larger House representation would have had to wait until after the election of 1862 to claim it. But California held its regular House election in 1861, and tried to fill three seats.

Phelps and Sargent were elected to California's two regular seats. The Biographical Directory says that Frederick F. Low presented credentials and claimed a third seat Dec. 2, 1861, but the House May 6, 1862, declared him not entitled to a seat. Following passage of an act of June 2, 1862, granting California its third seat before it normally would have received it, he was admitted.

The ballot arrangement for California's 1861 House election was ambiguous. The ICPSR returns suggest that Low, Gunahl, and Gitchell were probably listed in a separate column on the ballot as candidates in a separate at-large election for the prospective third seat, and Low's claim to the seat would be based on his having finished first among the three.

A second possibility is that all nine candidates for the House ran against each other in one at-large election. Low would have finished with the third highest number of votes in such a contest, and could conceivably have claimed the House seat on that basis.

1. These were six special elections to fill Alabama's House seats for the remainder of the 40th Congress (1867–1869).

2. These three elections were for a full two-year term in the 41st Congress (1869–1871). Arkansas was readmitted to the Union and had three representatives for part of the 40th Congress (1867–1869), but returns for their election were not available.

3. Florida was readmitted during the 40th Congress (1867–1869), and Charles M. Hamilton served for the remainder of that Congress. He was then reelected to a full term in the 41st Congress (1869–1871). The Florida candidates were running for the full term in the 41st Congress.

4. Figures represent returns in seven special elections held April 20, 1868. All winners listed, except John H. Christy in the 6th district, were seated July 25, 1868, to serve for the remainder of the 40th Congress (1867–1869), even though Georgia had not been formally readmitted to the Union.

On the convening of the 41st Congress in 1869, the six incumbent Georgia representatives claimed their election of April 20, 1868, also entitled them to seats in the 41st Congress. The House rejected the claim and Georgia then elected representatives to the 41st Congress, but these returns are not available. According to Georgia secretary of state archives, William Wiseman Paine (D) served in the House from the 1st district March 4, 1869, to March 3, 1871; Marion Bethune (R), 3rd district, served Jan. 16, 1871–March 3, 1871; and Stephen Alfestus Corker (D), 5th district, served Jan. 24, 1871–March 3, 1871. No returns on their elections are available. Georgia was readmitted to representation by act of July 15, 1870.

5. Louisiana was readmitted during the 40th Congress (1867–1869) and elected several representatives, but these returns are unavailable. The five elections shown here are for a full two-year term in the 41st Congress (1869–1871).

6. No representatives from Mississippi were seated from this election. Mississippi was not readmitted until Feb. 23, 1870.

7. The special elections were for unexpired terms in the 40th Congress (1867–1869). The general elections were for full two-year terms in the 41st Congress (1869–1871).

8. The “Special Elections” were to fill unexpired terms in the 40th Congress (1867–1869), while the others were for full terms in the 41st Congress (1869–1871). The at-large election in which J. P. M. Epping was the apparent winner was rejected by the House. According to the Biographical Directory, a number of southern states upon readmission claimed that since their slaves were emancipated, they were entitled to larger delegations in the House. Epping’s election falls in this category. The claims were rejected by the House.

1. Rep. John T. Deweese of the 4th district resigned Feb. 28, 1870. In the first special election held to fill the remainder of Deweese's term in the 41st Congress (1869–1871), Robert B. Gilliam was elected, but he never claimed the seat. In a second special election, John Manning Jr. was elected and took his seat Dec. 7, 1870.

2. South Carolina claimed an extra seat in the House and J. P. M. Epping was elected at-large to fill it. The House refused to seat him. (See South Carolina 1868.)

3. Virginia claimed an extra seat in the House, and Raleigh T. Daniel was elected at-large to fill it. The House refused to seat him. (See Virginia 1869.)

1. The first special election in the 16th district was held in January 1883 to fill the remaining two months of the term in the 47th Congress (1881–1883). The second special election was held in February 1883, to fill the House seat for a full term in the 48th Congress (1883–1885). Both elections were necessitated by the death of Rep. Jonathan T. Updegraff Nov. 30, 1882, following his reelection to the 48th Congress.

1. The first special election, won by Charles H. Page, was to fill a vacancy in the 49th Congress (1885–1887). A majority of the total vote was apparently not required to win this election.

The second special, won by Warren O. Arnold, was for a full term in the 50th Congress elections (1887–1889). The seat had been left unfilled in the regular 1886 general election because no candidate had the requisite majority. (See Rhode Island 1886.)

1. Since no candidate running for the House in Rhode Island's 2nd district in 1890 received the majority needed for election (see Rhode Island 1890), a special election in 1891 was ordered by the legislature. According to the Biographical Directory, incumbent Warren O. Arnold, who had run for reelection in 1890, but failed to win a majority, refused to participate actively in the special election. Without serious opposition, Charles H. Page won easily.

1. In Texas special elections for the House held prior to 1961, all candidates ran against each other in one election regardless of party; the candidate receiving the most votes was the winner. Thus Lyndon B. Johnson won a 1937 special election with 27.7 percent of the vote. (See Texas 1937.)

The Texas law was changed in 1961 to require that in a special election, if no candidate received a majority, a special election runoff would be held between the top two candidates.

Thus, in the three House special elections held in Texas in 1961, only the election in the 20th district produced a majority vote winner. In the 4th and 13th districts, no candidate received a majority. Runoff special elections between the top two candidates in each district were held in 1962. (See Texas 1962.)

AL	William Henry Harrison (R)	71,489	61.4
	Louis A. Mankus (D)	44,985	38.6

1. The race in Tennessee's 5th district was held without party affiliation. It was an outgrowth of a disputed Democratic primary between Fulton and Loser. Neither was given the Democratic nomination and the general election was conducted on a nonpartisan basis.

2. These elections were runoffs between the two candidates who finished with the most votes in special primaries held in 1961, but failed to win a majority. (See Texas 1961.)

1. Under Texas's special election law, a majority was required to win the House seat. Since no candidate had a majority in the initial special election, a runoff special election was held between the top two finishers. (See Texas 1961 for explanation of Texas special election law, p. 1266.)

1. Under California's special election law, a majority of the total vote cast was required for election. If no candidate achieved it, another election would be held with the top candidates from each party competing. In the 11th district, McCloskey had more votes than any other Republican, but not a majority of the total vote, so he became the Republican nominee against Archibald, the top Democrat, in the special election.

2. Following his reelection to the 90th Congress (1967–1969) in 1966, Powell was not allowed to take the oath of office in January 1967, and was subsequently excluded by vote of the House March 1, 1967. A special election was held April 11, 1967, to fill the vacancy. Powell was again a candidate and won easily, but he never attempted to claim the seat and it remained vacant for the remainder of the Congress. The Supreme Court later declared that Powell's exclusion was unconstitutional because he met the requirements set forth in the Constitution of age (twenty-five years), U.S. citizenship (seven years), and residency of the state from which elected.

1. The election returns shown from Mississippi's 3rd district were from a special runoff between Griffin and Evers, who had finished with the highest number of votes in an earlier special election. Both elections were held under a provision of Mississippi law requiring that all candidates in a special election for the House run against each other, regardless of party affiliations, with a majority required for election. Since neither Evers nor Griffin had a majority, the runoff was required.

The returns from the first special election were as follows: Charles Evers (D), 33,706, 29.3%; Charles H. Griffin (D), 28,927, 25.2; Ellis Bodron (D), 22,842, 19.9; Troy Watkins (D), 10,476, 9.1; Joe Pigott (D), 8,314, 7.2; Hagan Thompson (R), 7,978, 6.9.

1. No candidate received a majority of the vote, which was required to win in the first special election. Under California's special election law, the highest vote recipients from the first election from each party then faced each other in another election. In this case, Goldwater became the Republican nominee against Van de Kamp, the Democratic nominee.

1. L.L.J., the party affiliation of the 1st district candidate, J. M. Sanders, stands for "Life, Liberty, Justice."

2. In the 6th district special election, 146,147 votes were cast. To win outright without a second election, a candidate needed 73,074 votes. John L. Burton received 73,114 votes, 40 more than needed.

California was redistricted in 1974 for the November general election, changing the numbers of many of the districts. Burton was reelected to the 94th Congress (1975–1977) from the 5th district and Robert J. Lagomarsino from the 19th.

3. There are no reliable final returns for the House race in the 6th district. Postelection results showed Moore leading LaCaze by a handful of votes, but the outcome could not be determined because one voting machine had malfunctioned and did not record votes for LaCaze.

The case went to the Louisiana courts for resolution. LaCaze asked that persons who voted on the malfunctioning machine be polled again in court under oath and their votes added to the total, but the Louisiana Supreme Court rejected this plan and ordered a new election. Moore won easily. (See Louisiana 1975.)

4. The returns from the 1st district House race are not final. Kyros challenged Emery's election before the House Administration Committee, which conducted a partial recount of the returns until Kyros conceded defeat. The recount changed the total votes received by each candidate, but not the result.

1. For the 1978 House elections in Louisiana, an open primary was held with candidates from all parties running on the same ballot. Any candidate who received a majority was elected unopposed without any further appearance on the general election ballot. Where no candidate received 50 percent, there was a general election runoff between the top two finishers regardless of party.

1. For the 1980 House elections in Louisiana, an open primary election was held with candidates from all parties running on the same ballot. Any candidate who received a majority was elected unopposed, with no further appearance on the general election ballot. If no candidate received 50 percent, a runoff was held between the two top finishers.

2. In Minnesota the Democratic Party is known as the Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party and the Republican Party as the Independent-Republican Party; candidates appear on the ballot with these designations.
